

Arizona Developmental Disabilities Planning Council Legislative Update: June 7, 2013

The start of this past week found a shift in the ongoing push pull regarding the Governor's budget linked Medicaid expansion proposal. While the internal barriers were centering around the Speaker of the House Tobin's informal suggestion to take this issue to the voters, it became apparent that inside our legislative body, there is momentum to go one of two ways - but not to refer this matter to citizens. Some elected officials hoped to continue the momentum and move it through as crafted by the Governor's team, while the other side of the discussion process saw the entire expansion concept being declared dead and over within the legislature itself.

So this clear division created a third dimension of urgency, namely two former State Legislators moving to handle this pitch to the voting public through the referendum process. This is being spearheaded by former legislators, Ron Gould and Frank Antenori and would require 86,405 valid signatures of registered voters in the first 90 days after the Legislature adjourns. This process and potential outcome are problematic according to key election watchers because it would likely become the groundswell basis for the 2014 election. In addition, AHCCCS would bear the brunt of uncertainty. This is because the state's agreement with the U.S. Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services expires December 2013. The federal regulators in this area of service provision indicate that there will not be approval of a new agreement that includes a continuation of the AHCCCS enrollment freeze for childless adults. Therefore, as each day passes the entire service system and our elected body find the clock ticking away time to consider viable options. AHCCCS has indicated that providing coverage for the last group of childless adults with Arizona funds would cost an estimated $300 million dollars.

Proponents of the Governor's expansion proposal continued throughout the week to remind those inside the Legislature that an additional $1.6 billion 'federal' dollars would be infused into our Medicaid program at no 'net' (defined/real) cost to Arizona. In turn, this would enable an estimated 300,000 Arizonans in need to access quality health care and the estimation is that thousands of lives might be saved. There is an economic driver to this affirmative discussion also; those watching these impact issues for our state estimate that this funding would bring approximately 21,000 jobs to Arizona. This could include high paying health care sector employment.

The third leg of this stool of controversy then centered around a conversation regarding House Republicans working to 'kill' the Senate budget and working to literally 'start over'. It is unclear as to whether this might mean returning to the Joint Legislative Budget Committee's baseline budget. [The $8.8 billion budget approved by the State Senate last month, for FY 2014, included about $150 million more in spending than the JLBC baseline budget. This included an approximately 1% spending increase over last year's budget primarily in the areas of education and Child Protective Services.]

News reports as of June 5 indicated that the House Appropriations Committee would take up the current budget impasse and Medicaid expansion issues that have been the basis for the stalemate at our state Capitol. After much ongoing wrangling for a top position in the debate, things moved slowly forward with the ultimate hope that the Legislature can soon adjourn Sine Die. This play by play is the culmination of a three-week 'back and forth' with key members and the office of the Governor on the Medicaid health care issue. This is a 10 bill package overall and there is still much foot work to be done before final intent and language is captured to the satisfaction of all concerned. Speculation, however, is that 8-10 House Republicans will join the Senate's 24 Democrats in favor of expansion. This informal coalition has been in the background for a considerable time period.

Now as the week draws to a close there are two dueling or opposing plans in front of our elected officials with next week set to be a square-off in terms of debate. Speaker Tobin's budget has identified $29 M in tax cuts and his approach would spend less than the 'budget' passed last month by the Arizona Senate. Logistically this new budget is likely to receive a hearing next week by the House Appropriations Committee. The logjam in the conversation remains the entire Medicaid matter. The full projected impact of the conservative interests in stripping off the expansion language is unknown, but predictions are a whole sale confrontation. Dialogue on both sides of the aisle indicates that both budgets reflect a 'structural imbalance' (i.e., spending more than our state is expected to bring in through its tax base). Specific financial recommendations in each budget are reflected below:
